Niklas Luhmann, who in recent years has emerged as Germany's most prominent and controversial social theorist, suggests that postmodern theorizing has arrived at what Ilya Prigogine and Isabelle Stengers call a "bifurcation point," a state of instability in which a system can reorganize itself in unpredictable ways.

Front Matter - Uberty

Toward this end, the paper builds upon the social systems theory of Niklas Luhmann to explain the nature of the trade-off between complexity and sustainability. Exemplified by Luhmann's theory of ecological communication, the trade-off emerges because the growing systemic complexity entails the increasing risk that systems develop insensitivity to those environmental conditions on which they critically depend.
