The man-made landscape - the ordinary run-of-the-mill things that humans have created and put upon the earth-provides strong evidence of the kind of people we are, and were, and are in process of becoming. In other words, the culture of any nation is unintentionally reflected in its ordinary vernacular landscape.

In such a view landscape is a dynamic equilibrium of interacting processes. Man is of course an inexorable part of these systems in one way or another. His more obvious structures and movements in the landscape are most likely to be seen as "functions," that is, as processes undertaken for rational purposes.
